Surveys:
Household Budget Survey 1975, 1980, 1986, 1991
The survey was conducted by the Central Statistical Office covering the whole island. The sample consisted of 3360 households in 1980. One twelfth of the households were interviewed each month. The income concept was gross income including both money income and income in-kind. Money income includes salaries, wages and other receipts from employers, net earnings from self employment, business profits, income from personal investments such as rents, interests and dividends, royalties and commissions, periodic payments received from an inheritance or trust fund, alimony, pensions, annuity and other social security benefits, remittances and other cash assistance regularly received, and other periodic receipts. Income in-kind includes goods and services provided free of charge by an employer, household production for own consumption and net rental value of owner-occupied housing. Only four income ranges were available to UN (1985).
