UN at 75:
SLOW DEATH OR A NEW DIRECTION

MARK MALLOCH-BROWN
The United Nations University World Institute for Development Economics Research provides economic analysis and policy advice with the aim of promoting sustainable and equitable development for all. The Institute began operations over 30 years ago in Helsinki, Finland, as the first research centre of the United Nations University. Today it is a unique blend of think tank, research institute, and UN agency – providing a range of services from policy advice to governments as well as freely available original research.

United Nations University World Institute for Development Economics Research (UNU-WIDER) gratefully acknowledges the support of the governments of Finland, Sweden, and the United Kingdom to its 2019–23 work programme.

UNU-WIDER
Katajanokanrentt 6 B
00600 Helsinki, Finland

Copyright © UNU-WIDER 2021

Typescript prepared by Lorraine Telfer-Taisainen.

The views expressed in this paper are those of the author(s), and do not necessarily reflect the views of the Institute or the United Nations University, nor the programme/project donors.

ISSN 1455-3082 (print)
ISSN 1564-8311 (online)

ISBN 978-92-9256-961-7 (online)
UNU-WIDER had the honour and the pleasure to invite Lord Mark Malloch-Brown — a former UN Deputy Secretary-General, and earlier Chief of Staff under UN Secretary-General Kofi Annan — to deliver the twenty-fourth WIDER Annual Lecture on 26 October 2020, held virtually due to the ongoing pandemic.

The United Nations was founded in 1945, just after the Second World War, committed at the outset to further global peace and security among states, with an agenda of social progress and better living standards for people everywhere. The United Nations Charter, the foundational treaty of the United Nations, stressed a human rights-based approach to economic and social progress, that was radical for its times. Today, the UN finds itself at a crossroads. Nationalistic governments across the world reject multilateralism, the diplomatic and co-ordinated interaction between states, as a way of addressing problems that matter to their populations. Rather, these governments aggressively pursue transactional and competitive foreign policy agendas, casting aside agreed values and norms between UN member states, the number of which today stands at 193 countries, almost four-fold from the original fifty-one founding member states. The human rights-based agenda has come under increasing threat, with the rise of authoritarian and populist politics, and the development success of some countries that privileged collective economic rights over individual civil and political rights.

Beyond the din of this political debate, serious global issues press down hard. Climate change, depleting natural resources, and a pandemic are sober reminders that whatever national politicians claim, multilateralism is sorely needed to find global solutions to crises that do not respect national borders. Against this gloomy backdrop, Mark Malloch-Brown asks the following questions. Can the UN find allies needed to take up this new agenda? Can the UN build alliances with younger citizens, businesses, and civil society. Can the UN challenge these dangerous new nationalistic orthodoxies that are a threat to all? Can the UN be in the vanguard for change for a better world?

Kunal Sen
Director UNU-WIDER
Helsinki

---

About the author

Mark Malloch-Brown holds international board and advisory positions in the commercial and not-for-profit sectors. He currently co-chairs the UN Foundation and the International Crisis Group and is on the advisory committees to the heads of the IMF and UNICEF.

He served as Deputy Secretary-General and earlier Chief of Staff of the UN under Kofi Annan. For six years before that he was Administrator of UNDP, leading the UN’s development efforts around the world. Later he was later Minister of State in the UK’s Foreign Office, covering Africa and Asia, and sat in Prime Minister Gordon Brown’s cabinet. He has also served as Vice-Chairman of the World Economic Forum. He began his career as a journalist at The Economist and then worked for the UN High Commissioner for Refugees, and was later a Vice-President of the World Bank. He has served for many years on the Board of the Open Society Foundation.

He formerly chaired the Business Commission on Sustainable Development and the Royal Africa Society. He is author of The Unfinished Global Revolution: The Limits of Nations and the Pursuit of a New Politics.
The UN is buffeted by headwinds, some new and some almost as old as the institution itself. From its beginnings it has struggled to keep up with a changing world. Born in the euphoria of a post-world war moment 75 years ago it has struggled with the ups and downs of geopolitics, surging when the world is briefly united, and falling back when it is more frequently divided. It wallowed frequently close to the rocks at the heights of Soviet-US Cold War confrontation but intermittently rode something of a wave during the parallel periods of decolonisation.

That too, though, created its own challenges as membership has almost quadrupled largely because of the birth of these new post-colonial states. This challenged the early ascendancy of the Allied victors, and its founders, in both the UN’s governance and the staffing of the Secretariat and Agencies. To this day injustices are seen to remain in the distribution of posts between nationalities or in the perceived double standards of how the Security Council addresses issues. The influence of its post-Second World War founders remains disproportionate.

The UN has struggled from the start to be a mirror of the world it represents. The transition from its founding Anglo-Saxon and Western DNA to a more globally distributed state influence has been a struggle from the start. From 48 founding members 1945 to 193 today, the expansion reflects the big twentieth-century shifts — decolonisation, the collapse of the Soviet Empire, and the pursuit of self-determination by those overlooked by history’s cartographers. Adaptation to new members and their aspirations has been vital to the UN’s legitimacy and universality. Although there is still controversy at the senior leadership level, where nationals of the five

You cannot change the wind, but you can bend the sail

— a favourite African proverb of Kofi Annan
Permanent Members of the Security Council are seen as over-represented, among staff as a whole the UN of my experience was a gloriously diverse place that revelled in its mix of cultures and backgrounds.

Today, as big an issue may be a demographic revolution that goes far beyond the UN alone. A Youth Challenge is being mounted to the way we live, organise and govern ourselves. The social restrictions of COVID-19 may disguise the scale of the gathering social protest, but COVID-19 has also accelerated it. A digital revolution on the one hand and rising social and economic inequality on the other seems likely set to unseat a ruling establishment that has failed to navigate these tides. The UN, with a staff much older than the global mean and captured by a seemingly impenetrable intergovernmental culture, can seem out of touch.

The UN Charter, imbued with the wisdom and sacrifice of the survivors of a world war, is one of the world’s most eloquent and uplifting constitutional documents. It is also thoroughly Western, borrowing from America’s founding fathers and assuming a world order managed by the allied victors of 1945. This is reflected in a Western rights-based agenda that to this day has stressed human rights — in terms of individual civil and political rights, refugee protection, gender and reproductive health over collective economic rights.

There was an early opposition to Western dominance notably in the General Assembly centred on the championing of the New International Economic Order. Through the Non-Aligned Movement and the G77, new member states sought to correct the historical and structural imbalances in the global political economy. At the time, despite the passion brought to the debate by its champions, it seemed likely to remain a permanent backbench cause.

Now, however, it is not a simple division of East and West or North and South. Many of us emphasise collective social and economic rights within our own personal priorities — climate change, structural inequality and exclusion, and injustices in the global economic system. A Western human rights NGO or a former High Commissioner for Human Rights, Mary Robinson is as likely to be heard championing climate justice as the cause of political prisoners. And younger generations across geography have rallied to the cause of tackling climate change and protecting the environment. It is an issue that unites their grandparents’ UN to their own contemporary concerns.

China with President Xi’s remarkable pledge at the 2020 UN General Assembly to reach carbon neutrality by 2060 has put himself in a leadership role on the latter. But this is the same regime that has employed mass incarceration and extensive discrimination to suppress the political rights of its 12 million Uighur minority. The Economist editorialised on the desperate plight of the Uighurs observing, ‘China’s ruling party has no truck with this concept of individual rights. It claims legitimacy from its record of providing stability and economic growth to the many.’ ¹

China has flexed its muscles in the UN, where it is now at 12 per cent the second largest contributor to the assessed budget — strengthening its representation across the secretariat, agencies, funds, and programmes. It has become a more active voice in critical policy debates from regulation of the internet to peacekeeping.

And in the wider world, a more authoritarian model of government is the new majority. It embraces leaders who come to power by the ballot box and those who didn’t but who all share a preference for a nationalist foreign policy, weakening of domestic institutions and the rule of law including the political rights of its citizens, and a casual disregard for minority and in some cases majority rights.

¹ The Economist, 17-23 October 2020, Vol.437, Leader Page 13, Number 9216.
That’s the world today. For now, at least, they are the new majority in global share of population terms. Between them China, India, Russia, Turkey, Brazil, Hungary, university educated versus high school or less, those employed in new services sectors of economic change, now accelerated by COVID-19, has produced across much of the world’s politics similar divisions of city versus town and country versus urban.6

The widespread rejection of traditional middle-class liberalism reflects very real shifts in global public opinion that are unlikely to dissolve any time soon. The uneven impact of economic change, now accelerated by COVID-19, has produced across much of the world’s politics similar divisions of city versus town and country versus urban.6

Inevitably, perhaps as a consequence, this is an age of UN caution. What stymies ambition let alone action in the Human Rights Council is found in spades in the Security Council. Veterans can rarely remember a time when it was as disfunctional as today. It has basically proved incapable of agreeing, let alone acting, on almost any burning security issue. Richard Gowan (2018) of the International Crisis Group has observed that, “Divisions among its five permanent members have repeatedly undermined the UN’s way on political, security and human rights matters. Yet, in the aftermath of a Security Council broken on the anvil of the US-UK invasion of Iraq, a gale turned on state unanimity.”

And indeed the UN of today has similarly found space — notably around the iron curtain speech delivered in Fulton, Missouri in March 1946, when he warned of an extraordinary operational activism that saved countless lives and relieved huge suffering. The politics of getting into these situations was never easy; the compromises often disappointing; and the motives of major interested powers and donors only rarely altruistic but the space was carved out and generally held.

When I arrived at UNDP as Administrator I found a similar legacy of programmes established by my independent-minded American predecessors against the prevailing political grain of the time — the first UN assistance programme in ‘Red China’, PAPF; a programme begun in 1990 to support the Palestinians; or an office in North Korea whose establishment was still being contested by the US State Department years later when I was Administrator.

Yet parallel to this disheartening inertia and gridlock in New York there was expanding opportunity that was largely denied to those who came before and after him to get things done. And indeed the UN of today has similarly found space — notably around the period of conception and birth from the San Francisco conference in 1945 to Churchill’s Iron Curtain speech delivered in Fulton, Missouri in March 1946; or the coming conflict between the US and the Soviet Union.

Kofi Annan’s Secretary-Generalship was a second honeymoon for the UN, coming in 1997, an older generation — indeed in a few cases the original generation, the self-named ‘last of the Mohicans’ founded by those who has joined the UN Secretariat before 15 August 1946 when the Iron Curtain speech delivered in Fulton, Missouri in March 1946, when he warned of an extraordinary operational activism that saved countless lives and relieved huge suffering. The politics of getting into these situations was never easy; the compromises often disappointing; and the motives of major interested powers and donors only rarely altruistic but the space was carved out and generally held.

I tell this story to illustrate a simple truth. The political and security UN in New York was usually gridlocked but there was ample space for activism and innovation as long as you stayed well away from that graveyard, the Security Council. Operations like mine were run in the field and from Geneva, based on a mandate derived from international law, not the permission of the Security Council.

A few remarkable UN holdouts, such as Brian Urquhart, ingeniously shoehorned the UN into political and peacekeeping roles in the Middle East despite Big Power deadlock but this was the exception.

As I crisscrossed the world for UNHCR, from refugee hotspots in South East Asia, Pakistan and Afghanistan, Central America and the Horn of Africa, I saw that an extraordinarily committed and creative group of UNHCR leaders had managed to prise apart the Cold War gridlock and make sufficient space for an imaginative operational activism that saved countless lives and relieved huge suffering. The politics of getting into these situations was never easy; the compromises often disappointing; and the motives of major interested powers and donors only rarely altruistic but the space was carved out and generally held.

When I arrived at UNDP as Administrator I found a similar legacy of programmes established by my independent-minded American predecessors against the prevailing political grain of the time — the first UN assistance programme in ‘Red China’, PAPF; a programme begun in 1990 to support the Palestinians; or an office in North Korea whose establishment was still being contested by the US State Department years later when I was Administrator.

A UN, having to find space where it will not be bullied by its stronger members and ignored at key moments by many others, is not new. In fact, it’s been the condition to which it has been condemned for most of its 75 years. There was a brief, glorious period of conception and birth from the San Francisco conference in 1945 to Churchill’s Iron Curtain speech delivered in Fulton, Missouri in March 1946, when he warned of the coming conflict between the US and the Soviet Union.

Kofi Annan’s Secretary-Generalship was a second honeymoon for the UN, coming in 1997 after the fall of the Berlin Wall it was a moment of hope and alignment between the major powers of which he took ample advantage. He saw a moment of opportunity that was largely denied to those who came before and after him to get the UN’s way on political, security and human rights matters. Yet, in the aftermath of a Security Council broken on the anvils of the US-UK invasion of Iraq, a galled turned on him too. So, far at most 10 per cent, of the UN’s 75 years has the wind blown strongly in the right direction. For the rest success has come despite, not because of, member state unanimity.

What follows is a manifesto for a re-purposed UN that is both true to its Charter — but recognises the direction the winds are blowing; does not cling to the mast of a failing Western liberalism alone; but understands and responds to the dynamics that have left that liberalism, and it seems multilateralism, on the rocks. This is a comeback strategy for the world as it is, in order to allow us later to make the world as we want it to be.

The world needs to believe that the UN matters. That it is relevant. The UN still enjoys high levels of support in Pew and other surveys. Yet that support seems heavily aspirational — around what it ought to do, not what it does. Support falls when pollsters ask about its specific performance. Churchill would see this, in a term he used in his Fulton speech, as ‘Foundations built on sand’.

Without a more passionate public embrace it is hard to overcome the inter-state fault lines. Annan was possibly unique among Secretary-Generals in being able to appeal directly to people, citing the opening words of the Charter in justification: ‘We, the Peoples of the United Nations…’ Those before and since have been largely captives of governments and their disagreements.

On the one hand, the UN needs to demonstrate relevance to people’s leading concerns. On the other, it needs people to be more realistic about what it can achieve. For 75 years it has let people down because their expectations have been overblown. The UN’s supporters need to accept a more pragmatic UN rather than the aspirational ‘Save the World one that lights up the top line poll findings. It will always disappoint such UN’s supporters need to accept a more pragmatic UN rather than the aspirational ‘Save the World one that lights up the top line poll findings. It will always disappoint such UN’s supporters need to accept a more pragmatic UN rather than the aspirational ‘Save the World one that lights up the top line poll findings. It will always disappoint such UN’s supporters need to accept a more pragmatic UN rather than the aspirational ‘Save the World one that lights up the top line poll findings. It will always disappoint such UN’s supporters need to accept a more pragmatic UN rather than the aspirational ‘Save the World one that lights up the top line poll findings. It will always disappoint such UN’s supporters need to accept a more pragmatic UN rather than the aspirational ‘Save the World one that lights up the top line poll findings. It will always disappoint such UN’s supporters need to accept a more pragmatic UN rather than the aspirational ‘Save the World one that lights up the top line poll findings. It will always disappoint such UN’s supporters need to accept a more pragmatic UN rather than the aspirational ‘Save the World one that lights up the top line poll findings. It will always disappoint such UN’s supporters need to accept a more pragmatic UN rather than the aspirational ‘Save the World one that lights up the top line poll findings. It will always disappoint such UN’s supporters need to accept a more pragmatic UN rather than the aspirational ‘Save the World one that lights up the top line poll findings. It will always disappoint such UN’s supporters need to accept a more pragmatic UN rather than the aspirational ‘Save the World one that lights up the top line poll findings. It will always disappoint such UN’s supporters need to accept a more pragmatic UN rather than the aspirational ‘Save the World one that lights up the top line poll findings. It will always disappoint such UN’s supporters need to accept a more pragmatic UN rather than the aspirational ‘Save the World one that lights up the top line poll findings. It will always disappoint such UN’s supporters need to accept a more pragmatic UN rather than the aspirational ‘Save the World one that lights up the top line poll findings. It will always disappoint such UN’s supporters need to accept a more pragmatic UN rather than the aspirational ‘Save the World one that lights up the top line poll findings. It will always disappoint such UN’s supporters need to accept a more pragmatic UN rather than the aspirational ‘Save the World one that lights up the top line poll findings. It will always disappoint such UN’s supporters need to accept a more pragmatic UN rather than the aspirational ‘Save the World one that lights up the top line poll findings. It will always disappoint such UN’s supporters need to accept a more pragmatic UN rather than the aspirational ‘Save the World one that lights up the top line poll findings. It will always disappoint such UN’s supporters need to accept a more pragmatic UN rather than the aspirational ‘Save the World one that lights up the top line poll findings. It will always disappoint such UN’s supporters need to accept a more pragmatic UN rather than the aspirational ‘Save the World one that lights up the top line poll findings. It will always disappoint such UN’s supporters need to accept a more pragmatic UN rather than the aspirational ‘Save the World one that lights up the top line poll findings. It will always disappoint such UN’s supporters need to accept a more pragmatic UN rather than the aspirational ‘Save the World one that lights up the top line poll findings. It will always disappoint such UN’s supporters need to accept a more pragmatic UN rather than the aspirational ‘Save the World one that lights up the top line poll findings. It will always disappoint such UN’s supporters need to accept a more pragmatic UN rather than the aspirational ‘Save the World one that lights up the top line poll findings. It will always disappoint such UN’s supporters need to accept a more pragmatic UN rather than the aspirational ‘Save the World one that lights up the top line poll findings. It will always disappoint such UN’s supporters need to accept a more pragmatic UN rather than the aspirational ‘Save the World one that lights up the top line poll findings. It will always disappoint such UN’s supporters need to accept a more pragmatic UN rather than the aspirational ‘Save the World one that lights up the top line poll findings. It will always disappoint such UN’s supporters need to accept a more pragmatic UN rather than the aspirational ‘Save the World one that lights up the top line poll findings. It will always disappoint such UN’s supporters need to accept a more pragmatic UN rather than the aspirational ‘Save the World one that lights up the top line poll findings. It will always disappoint such UN’s supporters need to accept a more pragmatic UN rather than the aspirational ‘Save the World one that lights up the top line poll findings. It will always disappoint such UN’s supporters need to accept a more pragmatic UN rather than the aspirational ‘Save the World one that lights up the top line poll findings. It will always disappoint such UN’s supporters need to accept a more pragmatic UN rather than the aspirational ‘Save the World one that lights up the top line poll findings. It will always disappoint such UN’s supports. exclusion and the skewed inter-generational distribution of wealth and government benefits. There is worse to come. Employment in small and medium-size enterprises around the world, which counts for the majority of employment, seems particularly vulnerable.

Here is the UN’s great cause. Throw caution to the winds and lay out Guterres’ new social contract for the world to see. Deploy campaigning and convening to build a new global bargain. And put governments on the spot by indexing and spotlighting performance to expose which are delivering and which aren’t.

For the MDGs, I set up UN project offices outside the normal UN intergovernmental constraints to measure and create league tables and score cards of national performance that allowed citizens to hold their government to account; then under Jeff Sachs, to cost out what it would take to achieve the goals; and finally a team to liaise and communicate with civil society activists that was more jeans and T-shirts than the typical UN Brooks Brothers uniform.

Build on that precedent. Push bravely on the door. If I have a mild complaint about the SDGs it is that they have lost something of the edgy outsider status of the early MDGs. The UN is too much the incumbent and not enough the insurgent and it shows in the difficulty the current UN has in breaking through in communications terms.

On such a campaign’s coattails remake the argument for multilateralism. Argue too many of these problems cannot be fixed at the country level alone. Local results, on say climate, require global collaboration and action. Once the UN is reconnected to grassroots concern it is not a hard argument to make. If a campaign that mobilises younger citizens around this global economic and personal security agenda is to have legs it must find allies where it can and not be constrained by the foot-dragging back end of the General Assembly. When the UN has touched the stars, the lift has come from civil society not government. Civil society was active in San Francisco in 1945, pushing the level of ambition of the official conference as it was later when Eleanor Roosevelt led the drafting of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

Today around each SDG clusters a network of champions. In many, corporates show greater ambition than governments. In all, the most innovative thinking comes from the many corners of the civil society mosaic — local and international NGOs, mayors and their cities, governors and CEOs; activists and academics that harness the energy. The UN Foundation which I co-chair interfaces with many of these groups. Their commitment is bracing but needs to be more fully included in the working methods of a future UN.

Building variegated coalition of states and non-state actors willing to be first movers on different parts of this agenda is a not a new path to action in the UN. Now it needs to be turbo-charged. The world won’t wait for the most plodding and resistant nations to sign up to action. With civil society allies the UN needs to be much bolder in shaping, not just responding to, countries’ agendas.

This same variegated approach needs to be applied to the more difficult area of human rights. The official intergovernmental body, the Human Rights Council is not fit for purpose but as one of the authors of the reform that raised it from Commission to Council, I doubt there is an institutional fix. The UN in the person of the High Commissioner for Human Rights needs to choose their ground and pick their fights — determine a mix of individual and collective rights on which they wish to particularly stand and marshal the UN’s allies, a variegated coalition if ever there was one of states and NGOs, to champion Rights for which it can build support.

And where the High Commissioner cannot, and the Council will not, raise their voice, their office must still let its reporting speak for itself. Abuses of rights must be universally reported and documented, but allies in civil society and government partners must raise their voices when politics prevents the UN machinery shouting out abuses. The UN needs to be part of a rights ecosystem where different partners can each step up where their comparative advantage lies. It cannot make conscience a hostage to politics, but it must also make its intergovernmental structure more malleable. It can do that as civil society becomes a more recognised voice, one that can balance out the silence or opposition on occasion of governments. The current High Commissioner, Michelle Bachelet has the stature to thread this difficult needle.

A less-noticed front in the battle to protect human rights is around civil society voice at the country level. UN Resident Co-ordinators that I have spoken to in recent months, and indeed the UN’s 75th research, suggests closing space for their civil society partners around debating or criticising the performance of government on service delivery, or corruption and accountability. Resident Co-ordinators and the UN system must be critical protectors and promoters of local civil society voices. Too many governments see the current political climate as a license to step on their home critics. The UN needs to step in and protect its civil society partners. A Global Social Contract will be stillborn without them.

And the final step to restored effectiveness is of course in time to recover authority in the political and security space.
To conclude, seize the moment

If there is a silver lining it is that the character of conflict continues to change, opening grim new opportunity. Not only is peacemaking less than ever the thin blue line between states, it is not even in many cases policing full-blow internal conflicts in a Democratic Republic of the Congo or Syria as in the past.

The more likely future of conflict, at least where the UN will have a role, is low-level but persistent political violence around exclusion, suppression of minority rights and inter-generational conflict in a context of deteriorating state institutions such as policing, justice and social service delivery.

The way into these situations that may not be via the Security Council but rather via humanitarian, development and the human rights arms of the system. These will be development and rights breakdowns where the UN is already present. The UN will not have to wait for the permission of the Security Council — it is there already. The World Bank has estimated that by 2030 two-thirds of the world’s extreme poor could be living in areas of conflict and violence.

Or where the Security Council has allowed deployment it is the heads of those missions, the Special Representatives of the Secretary-General who, in their local good offices work, do more to heal wounds and build bridges than their masters around the Security Council table.

Pursuing solutions to conflict outside the confines of the Security Council may have a further benefit. Perhaps its privileged owners, the P5, may come to recognise through being so ostracised that unreformed they risk going down with the ship. Only through an ambitious expansion of ‘ownership’ through the election perhaps of key states to much longer revolving terms than today’s elected members; together with reform of the rules to limit veto use and ensure an open agenda to address all threats to peace and security; together with the right of all parties, non-state as well as state, to participate in the evidence gathering phase of the deliberations can we rebuild a Security Council that counts.

For years there has been demand for Security Council reform. This would almost certainly require Charter amendment. The difficulties of that have offered a convenient hiding place for those reluctant to embrace change. However, if today under Article 109 of the Charter a review conference was called, a different starting point might be collective rights as discussed here. More robust burden-sharing and individual government accountability around climate change and other public goods issues might be a more powerful entry point to a restrengthened UN than the locked door of Security Council reform. A younger generation is demanding that the world changes course and embraces an ambitious agenda to heal itself. Too many national governments stand in the way. The UN needs to choose sides.

This is not a manifesto to change the world overnight. Rather it is a call for the UN to seize the moment and take advantage of the opportunities it has at a time of global crisis to recover relevance and to drive a new global consensus on tackling our collective weaknesses that COVID-19 has so cruelly exposed. There is a majority out there for a better governed and prepared, more caring and inclusive world but that same majority has grown impatient with existing institutions. The UN can be part of that failed past or attach itself to an emerging future.

Let The Campaign begin.

© UN Photo / Martine Perret
WIDER ANNUAL LECTURES

24 | Slow Death or a New Direction
Mark Malloch-Brown

23 | Informality – addressing the Achilles heel of social protection in Latin America
Santiago Levy

22 | The Political Economy Of Structural Transformation: Has Democracy Failed African Economies?
Ernest Aryeetey

21 | How are People Poor?
Sabina Alkire

20 | Interventions against Poverty in Poor Places
Martin Ravallion

19 | Development research and changing priorities
Amartya Sen

18 | Managing Structural Transformation: A Political Economy Approach
C. Peter Timmer

17 | Egalitarian Principles: The Foundation for Sustainable Peace
Martti Ahtisaari

16 | The Folk and the Formula: Fact and Fiction in Development
Lant Pritchett

15 | From Flying Geese to Leading Dragons: New Opportunities and Strategies for Structural Transformation in Developing Countries
Justin Yifu Lin

14 | Reforming the International Monetary System
José Antonio Ocampo

13 | The Trade-Development Nexus in Theory and History
Ronald Findlay

12 | Developing Countries in the World Economy: The Future in the Past?
Deepak Nayyar

11 | The Climate Change Challenge
Kemal Derviş

10 | Global Patterns of Income and Health: Facts, Interpretations, and Policies
Angus Deaton

9 | The World is Not Flat: Inequality and Injustice in our Global Economy
Nancy Birdsell

8 | Rethinking Growth Strategies
Dani Rodrik

7 | Global Labour Standards and Local Freedoms
Kashik Basu

6 | Winners and Losers in Two Centuries of Globalization
Jeffrey G. Williamson

5 | Horizontal Inequality: A Neglected Dimension of Development
Frances Stewart

4 | Globalization and Appropriate Governance
Jagdish N. Bhagwati

3 | Is Rising Income Inequality Inevitable? A Critique of the Transatlantic Consensus
Sir Anthony B. Atkinson

2 | More Instruments and Broader Goals: Moving Toward the Post-Washington Consensus
Joseph E. Stiglitz

1 | The Contribution of the New Institutional Economics to an Understanding of the Transition Problem
Douglass C. North

The collection of Annual Lectures 1997–2004 is available as: Wider Perspectives on Global Development
Published in Studies in Development Economics and Policy, by Palgrave Macmillan (ISBN 9781403996312)